His palms are blackened with fat, John Mann maintains hilarious demeanor in the back corner of Mann and Sons Of Sporting Goods in Pinckneyville, diligently retooling the trigger on the rifle as he talks about his more than five decades in the arms business. The weapon worked for him as long as he worked for them. I'm 62 and I've been doing this my whole life, says Mann, quickly adjusting his black-rimmed glasses and gesticulating to his admittedly cluttered workspace. I've been behind this bench my whole life. It will work for you, he adds, despite the fact that decades of hunchback took no small losses on your back. But Mann will get something of a reprieve in the coming days after the process of selling his business to one of his long-time employees, Janet Ashby, is completed. Ashby, who has worked at the Mann store for about 15 years, says she is keen to continue the long tradition of the sporting goods store, first established by Mann's father in 1946, but the transition does bring some extra stress. It's all hitting our faces right now, Ashby says with a laugh. Ashby plans to make subtle changes to the business, which also employs her son, Dustin Smith, as a resident gunsmith. Some things, like holding Red Wing and LaCrosse brands, will remain the same as in-store gun repair services. Ashby, however, wants to move on in gun recovery, and she also plans to change the clock, so the store is closed on Mondays. We want to have a life away from work, she says. The name of the business will also get customized from Mann and the son of sporting goods just Mann Sporting Goods. We keep (Mann)'s name, she says with conviction. We'd be crazy not to! Mann had been looking for a buyer for some time, but just walked in equation after other efforts Mann failed and he told her more or less, why don't you buy it? Now that the deal is almost complete, Mann is ready to step aside, though the store carries its own history as much as any particular product line. Mann's father opened a place on West Water Street in 1961, and some of Mann's early years were spent on his father's side, where he first learned how to clean the weapons that came to the store. In his youth, Mann wanted to work on airplanes and even visited SIU just for this purpose, but since his father died almost 40 years ago, Mann has been an individual store owner. Mann is ready to step aside - ready to spend more time with others with his lesser business interests, ready to visit the salon where he owns a part in Canada, ready to just mow my yard, he says. However, the store has been a part of his life and he knows that he will be recharging on occasion to work on a particularly unusual gun. In the end, however, Mann is ready to take a new phase of his life - and he's happy to leave his shop in what he considers good hands. I'm ready to slow down, he says. I love working on guns, but there are places I have to go and people I need to see. CCPASporting Goods, Weapons and Armory, Hunting and Fishing Reserves Be the first to consider!
